First, a team brings together a broader range of knowledge, expertise, and skills than any single person could have on their own. Additionally, with more people and resources at their disposal, a team can respond more quickly to challenges and generate more creative solutions. Often, the collective nature of the group encourages risk-taking, as the responsibility for decisions is shared, making individuals more willing to take chances that they might avoid alone. Being part of a team can also be highly rewarding for its members. When individuals contribute to decision-making, they are more likely to feel invested in the outcomes and motivated to work hard. Furthermore, team members have greater opportunities to stand out and have their ideas recognized. Because the results of a team's work can be more far-reaching and impactful, individual ideas and efforts are often seen as more significant than if they were carried out by a single person. Listening:Let me tell you about a company that decided to assign some of its new projects to teams, giving them full responsibility for planning and executing the work. After six months, the company reviewed the teams' performance and found some unexpected results. In almost every team, there were members who contributed very little but still reaped the benefits if the team succeeded. Conversely, the members who put in significant effort and offered valuable insights didn't receive individual recognition the credit went to the team as a whole, with no specific names mentioned. As you might imagine, the more active contributors were frustrated by this lack of acknowledgment, which went against the idealized view of teamwork where everyone's contributions are appreciated. Another issue the company discovered was that some projects moved very slowly because the team spent too much time trying to reach a consensus. Countless meetings were needed to get everyone on the same page, delaying progress. Conversely, in other situations, one or two dominant individuals took control, influencing the direction of the project. For example, if these influencers dismissed an idea with a quick "That will never work," the rest of the group often dropped the idea without further discussion. In some cases, these influencers convinced the team that their plans were "highly creative"—even when some team members raised concerns about potential issues. Sadly, those warnings were ignored. As you might expect, when the project ultimately failed, the blame was spread across the entire team. Directions: Candidates are allotted 20 minutes to plan and write their responses. Responses will be judged based on quality, coherence, grammar, vocabulary, and content relevance. An effective response can range between 150 to 250 words. TOEFL Writing Task 1 Sample AnswersThe lecturer discusses research conducted by a company that implemented a group-based approach to handling projects. He highlights several ways in which the real-world outcomes differed from the theory presented in the passage. First, some team members took advantage of the system by contributing very little, yet still receiving recognition. If the project failed, these individuals were often the first to be blamed, which directly contradicts the passage's suggestion that group work helps individual contributions stand out. Second, the lecturer notes that groups were actually slower in making progress than individuals. While the passage argues that groups are more responsive and efficient due to the combined knowledge and resources of multiple people, the lecturer points out that the company found decision-making to be slow. Groups needed extensive meetings to build consensus, which delayed progress, again contradicting the passage's claim that groups are quicker and more efficient. Third, the lecturer discusses how influential individuals within a group can steer the team toward success or failure. While having strong leaders can benefit a project, if those individuals lead the group in the wrong direction, there's often no one with enough influence to challenge their decisions. This can turn the group dynamic into something resembling a dictatorship, where the dominant voices shape the outcome, potentially leading the team down a narrow, one-sided path. This lack of flexibility can result in failure, showing another way the group process can fall short of the ideal presented in the passage. TOEFL Writing Task 2 Sample AnswersThis task simulates a discussion board on a university website, where candidates see questions posted by a professor along with two student responses. Students are expected to read the question and responses to frame their own answer within the allotted time, i.e. 10 minutes. Candidates must have to write a 100-word answer on the dashboard, a word counter will be displayed on the screen as they write. Candidates can see the questions and responses while writing the answer which eliminates the need to take notes. Sample: Write a post on the professor's question about a class on Ecology. Your Response Should IncludeSupport to your opinionContribute to the discussionAn effective essay contains at least 100 words. As our cities and industries continue to expand, we face the challenge of balancing human needs with environmental conservation. Some argue that land should primarily be used for farmland, housing, and industry, rather than setting it aside for endangered species. Do you think human development should take precedence over protecting wildlife habitats, or is it possible to prioritize both human needs and the preservation of endangered species? How can we find a balance between the two? Response 1: Hey everyone! I believe it's important to strike a balance. While farmland, housing, and industry are essential for our survival and economic development, we must also recognize our responsibility to protect endangered species. By safeguarding their habitats, we help maintain the balance of ecosystems, which ultimately benefits both wildlife and human communities. Response 2: Hey everyone, I believe it's really important to find a balanced approach in this discussion. While it's essential to meet our basic needs, such as housing and agriculture, we must also recognize that we share the planet with other species. We can't justify compromising their right to exist simply for our convenience. It's crucial to consider both human and environmental needs as we plan for the future. Answer: I believe it is essential to strike a balance between human development and environmental preservation. While it's true that we need land for housing, farming, and industry to support growing populations and economies, we must also recognize that healthy ecosystems are critical for our long-term survival. Endangered animals play vital roles in maintaining ecological stability, such as pollination and pest control, and their extinction can disrupt these processes with far-reaching consequences. Rather than viewing conservation as an obstacle to progress, we should approach development in a way that minimizes harm to natural habitats. By adopting sustainable practices like responsible land use and protecting key wildlife areas we can meet human needs without compromising biodiversity. Ultimately, preserving both human well-being and the natural environment should not be seen as opposing goals, but as interconnected priorities that support the overall health of the planet.
